The BETA (Behavioral Evaluation and Threat Assessment) Team evaluates reports about University of Maryland students who are concerning.

It is rare for our students to be disruptive or violent. But sometimes students behave (in or out of the classroom) in ways that are worrisome or alarming. Examples may include:

- A student in distress may be disruptive, uncontrollably angry, or hostile.
- A student who is troubled may act bizarre or disturbed.
- Threatening — in person, on the telephone, or electronically
- A student who is in emotional pain may express suicidal thoughts or may hurt themself
- If a student has a weapon, is violent, or is threatening — in person or electronically, call Police.

If you are concerned about a student for whatever reason, contact the police or any other member of the BETA Team. Early intervention is important.
